

From Flats to Heels, From Girl to Woman

By: Tanya Mukhi & Valeria Reyes

The Quinceañera with her Court of Honor, before the reception

Photo Credits to: Aaron Eye - Filipino Photography

The Quinceañera in the Mass of Thanking, along with her parents, family, Court of Honor, special people, and the priest blessing her on becoming a woman.

Photo Credits: Studio 35 Photography

Quinceañera Tradition

The word "Quinceañera" comes from the Spanish words "quince" for fifteen and "años", which means "years". It's the journey to maturity for Latin American girls. The celebration highlights God, music, food, dance, family and friends. Before, the quinceañeras would start their day going to a Misa de Acción de Gracias (Mass of Thanking), where it shows religious devotions. Then they have a reception, which is full of cultural traditions.

The Quinceañera rite of passage is all about her, however she doesn't have to plan it herself.

The process of planning the quinceañera is very long and stressing. Sisters, female cousins, and friends are always good help to plan her Fiesta de Quinceaños. They will give her tips with the dances, decorations, dresses, and the people for her party. Her sisters, female cousins and friends will be better help than her mother because her mother would not approve as many things as them, and would be very annoying to deal with.

The Mass of Thanking

In the mass, the quinceañera is treated like a princess, her parents and her godparents escort her and she has a flower headpiece, during the mass, a tiara exchanges the flower headpiece. She is given Bible, cross and rosary by her padrino (godfather) and she leaves with her caballero (chambelán/gentleman)

Father-daughter dance is the most significant and awaited part in the reception. The caballeros are waiting to waltz with the quinceañera one by one.

Photo Credits Aaron Eye - Filipino Photography

The Reception

The reception starts with introducing the Corte de Honor (Court of Honor) – which is usually 14 Damas who wear gowns and 15 Caballeros who wear tuxedos or suits, one of them being her personal caballero. Older siblings, cousins or special friends will be her Damas and Caballeros. Its better to have older people as her Damas and Caballeros, because that will ensure that they know what to do during the Corte de Honor because they've been through that before. The rest of the family can join the preparations and ceremonies.

The quinceañera makes her grand entrance. She waltzes with her father and then with her personal caballero and the other caballeros. The most awaited moment in the Quinceañera is the father-daughter dance, in which the father is honored to have he's daughters first dance when she has turned into a woman.

Traditionally, the girl has not worn high heels before, and the dad changes her heels from flats in the middle of the reception to show that she is maturing. There is also the last doll, which represents she is becoming a woman and that doll is kept in the family as tradition. Traditionally her mother or grandmother will give her "Last Doll" at her Party. The dress should be pastels or white signifying purity. She is done up with make up, with her hair and nails done too.

After, the brindis – a toast for the quinceañera, the 15-candle ceremony takes place. The origin of the 15-Candle Ceremony is believed to be from Argentina and somehow from the American sweet sixteen tradition. The quinceañera chooses 15 significant and special people for her in her life and gives a candle to them and makes a speech about them. Not long after, usually the dad says a speech.

Nowadays, this ritual is practiced differently, but there is still a lot of culture, like having your Court of Honor

Photo Credits: Aaron Eye - Filipino Photography

The Present Time

Nowadays the girls have outrageous and extremely expensive parties, but they sometimes exchange it for a new car or a trip with their best friends (tour to Europe, Cruises, etc.) It's not so much a religious ceremony anymore; its mostly cultural if the girl wants to celebrate her coming of age with family and friends. Also, different religions practice this ritual, as long as you're culture is Hispanic. In Mexico, the tradition of the quinceaños still remains strong with a lot of religious devotion. In Central America and South America, in places like Panama and Colombia, the ritual is mostly about the reception and the waltz, which is more cultural and tradition, instead of religious.

Mostly no one goes to church for the Misa de Acción de Gracias. The flower headpiece switched to the tiara is sometimes practiced in the reception. The high heels tradition often doesn't happen anymore because most of the girls have already worn high heels. The doll is not practiced anymore. Dresses are all different type of colors and most girls wear make-up from before their quinceaños, so it's not a ritual item. Nowadays, close friends and family members also give speeches. Modern day, there is a surprise dance; which is choreographed from long before.

Bibliography

C

de la Cova, D. A. (1997, December 15). Quinceañera Traditions. Retrieved September 20, 2013, from Latin American Studies: <http://www.latinamericanstudies.org/latinos/quince-traditions.htm>

K

Karthik, N. (2010, January 7). Quinceañera Tradition. Retrieved September 9, 2013, from Buzzle: <http://www.buzzle.com/articles/quinceanera-traditions.html>

U

University of Wisconsin-Madison. (2009). Quinceañera: A History of a Tradition. Retrieved September 17, 2013, from Myths of Latin America:

<http://users.polisci.wisc.edu/LA260/quinceanera.htm>

Unknown. (n.d.). The Quinceañera. Retrieved September 15, 2013, from Mis 15 Años: <http://www.quinceanera.us/english/quinceanera.html>

Unkown. (2013). About The Ceremony. Retrieved September 18, 2013, from Quinceañera: <http://www.quincehelp.com/ceremony/about-the-ceremony/quinceanera-history-and-traditions.html>